Colonial Beach, Va., the excursion resort on the lower Potomac at which many residents of this city spend their summer vacations, was a sufferer from the heavy northeast storm of last Saturday. According to reports, the high tide, reaching within a few inches of the boardwalk, allowed the seas to sweep over it. A portion of it was carried away. The worst damage was done when the bugeye Sallie White, owned in Lower Machodoc creek, Va., which was lying at anchor in front of the town, was carried from her moorings and into the boardwalk, which was demolished for a considerable distance. The vessel was left on the beach a total wreck. There was no one aboard her when she came ashore.

Other vessels lying at Colonial Beach were saved from going ashore by getting out extra anchors, and even with additional ground tackle it looked at times as if they would part chains. A considerable portion of a clay bank along the beach, below the freight pier, was hammered so severely by the waves that a large section of it finally washed away. When the wind shifted and danger was over, the washed-out bank was in places within ten feet of cottages. Colonial Beach was the most exposed place on the river and surfered the worst of the steamhoat plers on both sides of the river the high water came over the wharves and into warehouses, damaging freight stored in them. It is stated the loss from the encroaching water will not be heavy. As most of the oyster fleet were in safe harbor and there were few vessels on the river, damage to shipping, when all reports are in, it is thought, will be found small.
